Figma's IPO price hit a $19.3B valuation out of the gate

Figma will begin trading on the New York Stock Exchange on Thursday in one of the most anticipated IPOs of 2025. The IPO is 40x oversubscribed, VCs confirmed to TechCrunch and Bloomberg previously reported.

That means demand for shares is 40x the number of shares the company and its existing investors are selling. So it should surprise no one that Figma, which offers design software, has priced its initial shares at $33 per share, above its previously announced range.

On Monday, the company said its expected price range was $30 to $32, up from a previously announced range of $25 to $28. At the final $33 price, the offering raised $1.2 billion. Most of that money is going to existing shareholders who are selling about twice as many shares (including founder and CEO Dylan Field) as the company itself has offered.

The IPO price values Figma at $19.3 billion, CNBC reports, near the $20 billion price Adobe would have paid before its deal to buy Figma fell apart in 2023 under pressure from regulators.

Figma's stock soared in its highly anticipated IPO, market cap instantly hit $45B

Julie Bort — 11:15 AM PDT · July 31, 2025

Figma began trading on the New York Stock Exchange on Thursday after a long delay. It soared so quickly that trading was halted for a short time due to market volatility.

Within a minute of trading, its market cap hit $45 billion but the price spent the day bouncing between $101 and as high as $124. It closed at $115.50 and a $47 billion market cap, Yahoo Finance reports.

The company and existing investors sold shares at the IPO price of $33 per share. Quite the pop. And after-market trading is still hot with the stock price climbing.

There has been so much demand for this stock that people on X were posting funny pictures of their orders being fulfilled by Robinhood. Instead of getting dozens or hundreds of shares as requested, they were allocated one solitary share, they said. (One person bragged about getting 17 shares.)

In any case, the successful IPO means Figma's failed $20 billion acquisition by competitor Adobe in 2023 is now just a shoulder-shrug footnote in its history.

Figma moves closer to a blockbuster IPO that could raise $1.5B

Julie Bort — 2:55 PM PDT · July 1, 2025

Figma publicly shared its financials Tuesday, inching the design software company closer to an IPO. And while this initial S-1 is missing details such as number of shares to be offered and what price, the regulatory filing provides the clearest view yet of its financial health — and potential.

IPO experts Renaissance Capital estimate that Figma could raise up to \$1.5 billion in this offering. If it does meet or exceed that, Figma's IPO will match or beat CoreWeave's, which raised $1.5 billion and has been the biggest tech IPO of 2025 so far.

There are some reasons to believe that Figma could pull it off. Its financials are impressive, per the S-1 filing.

The company brought in $749 million in revenue in 2024, a 48% jump from 2023. Figma's revenue continued to rise in the first quarter of 2025 with 46% year-over-year growth. The company reported rolling 12-month revenue as $821 million, with a 91% gross margin.

Figma's profit is interesting, too. The company was profitable in 2023 and then swung to a giant loss of $732 million in 2023. But this was largely due to one-time expenses related to a major employee stock compensation event. (Figma issued 10.5 million stock options, with a strike price of $8.50 per share to eligible employees, it said.)

By the fourth quarter of 2024, Figma reported profits again, as it did in Q1 of 2025.

Figma has also calculated its total debt to be so negligible that it reports it has none. But again, this is a line item that needs to be filled in. The company, naturally, has a revolving debt line, and left room to update its total debt in association with that.

We also don't know yet if any of the executives or VCs will be selling shares. Major backers include Index, Greylock, Kleiner Perkins, and Sequoia.

We do know that in 2024, executives took part of a big tender offer that allowed employees to cash out of shares. For instance, Figma co-founder CEO and chairman Dylan Field cashed out of $20 million worth of shares as part of that sale.

The S-1 document made another interesting disclosure, about co-founder Evan Wallace, who left Figma in 2021, according to his website.

Wallace is named in the documents as a co-founder. However, Figma says Wallace has given Field full voting rights and control over his shares. Wallace's family trust holds about one-third of the super-voting rights Class B shares (15 votes per share, Figma says). All told, the S-1 discloses that Field, pre-IPO, controls about 75% of the voting rights.

The financials certainly look like the kind of company that Wall Street and retail investors typically like to buy. The one black cloud, if you can call it that, is the rise of vibe coding/designing AI apps. Upstarts like Lovable are targeting Figma’s market and growing fast. Figma, though, has its own set of AI products as well.

Figma acknowledges in the S-1 the risks of failing to stand out in a competitive AI industry.

“While we have made, and expect to continue to make, significant investments to integrate AI, including generative AI, into our platform, AI technologies are rapidly evolving and there can be no guarantee that our products will remain competitive as new AI technologies are developed, adopted, and integrated into software solutions,” the company says in the regulatory document.

When Figma announced its initial hoped-for price range on Monday (\$25-\$28), it also revealed an unusual decision for its highly anticipated IPO.

IMAGE CREDITS: HAJE KAMPS / TECHCRUNCH

It will allow existing shareholders to sell more shares than the company plans to sell, by a high ratio. The company plans to offer about 12.5 million shares. Yet existing shareholders will be allowed to cash out of nearly 24.7 million shares, it said.

In addition, should this IPO be as hot as everyone thinks it will be, existing shareholders will get the option to sell, collectively, up to 5.5 million more shares.

Figma founder CEO Dylan Field has disclosed that he plans to sell 2.35 million shares. At the midrange he'll be cashing out of over $62 million. (That might be a much higher number if the IPO prices above $28, too.)

Even with that sale, he will still own an enormous number of shares and control the company. He will hold 74% of the voting rights after the IPO. This is thanks to supervoting rights of 15 votes per share for the Class B stock he controls, plus the right to vote the Class B shares of his co-founder, Evan Wallace, the company says in its S-1.

Figma's biggest venture investors are all cashing out some shares, as well, including Index, Greylock, Kleiner Perkins, and Sequoia. Should the demand be there for the over-allotment, they will cash out 1.7 million to 3.3 million shares apiece. That should allow them to return some cash to their investors in this liquidity-starved venture market.

It should be noted, though, that each of these investors is keeping the lion's share of their Figma holdings. One way to interpret this largely secondary sale is that if the company hadn't opened up share sales to existing investors, it might not have had enough shares to meet the demand.

As you might expect, the company will not make money from the shares its stockholders sell. But should it price above its announced range (as often happens with hot IPOs), Figma will raise more, as will its shareholders.

Prior to pricing, IPO experts expected Figma to sell around $1.5 billion worth of stock. Should it price above range and exceed that, Figma would be the biggest IPO of 2025 to date. The IPO could happen next week, so we shall soon see. Figma declined further comment.

Figma ignores the fear, files paperwork for an IPO

Julie Bort — 2:54 PM PDT · April 15, 2025

Design software startup Figma announced Tuesday it has filed its confidential paperwork for an IPO. We won't know more until that paperwork becomes public, which, best-case scenario would be in about a month.

However, with the stock market in groundhog mode — seeing its shadow with every new gyration of the Trump administration's trade policies and tariffs — pursuing an IPO right now is surprising, even at an exploratory level. Klarna and StubHub, the two potentially blockbuster tech IPOs that were humming along last month, both hit the pause button in early April after the stock market crashed on tariff news. They have not yet rescheduled.

While Figma is working on an IPO, that doesn't mean it will proceed in the usual timeline, which is often four to six weeks after confidential paperwork has been accepted.

Figma, which makes collaborative software and web applications for designers, was last valued at \$12.5 billion in May of 2024 after it completed a tender offer that allowed existing shareholders to cash out some of their stake. Adobe attempted to buy Figma for $20 billion, but that deal fell through in 2023 after regulatory pushback against the deal in Europe and the United States.

The company is backed by venture firms Sequoia Capital, Index Ventures, Greylock, and Kleiner Perkins, which have investors that sit on its board, along with a long list of other outfits, including Andreessen Horowitz and IVP.

Figma declined further comment.
