Figma's stock soared in its highly anticipated IPO, market cap instantly hit $45B gma began trading on the New York Stock Exchange last Thursday after a 10-hour delay. It soared so quickly that trading was halted for a short time due to market volatility.

The company's IPO price of $100 per share, and the popularity of the IPO, after-market trading is still hot with the stock price climbing.

There has been so much demand for this stock that people on X were posting funny pictures of their orders being fulfilled by Robinhood. Instead of getting dozens or hundreds of shares as requested, they were allocated one solitary share, they said. (One person bragged about getting 17 shares.)

In any case, the successful IPO means Figma's failed $20 billion acquisition by competitor Adobe in 2023 is now just a shoulder-shrug footnote in its history.

Figma's IPO price hit a $19.3B valuation out of the gate

Figma will begin trading on the New York Stock Exchange on Thursday in one of the most anticipated IPOs of 2025. The IPO is 40x oversubscribed, according to TechCrunch and Bloomberg.

That of some of the most successful companies are which shares announce

On Monday, the company will range from $10 to $150 per share, announce a price, the money is going to existing shareholders who are selling about twice as many shares (including founder and CEO Dylan Field) as the company itself has offered.

The IPO price values Figma at $19.3 billion, CNBC reports, near the $20 billion price Adobe would have paid before its deal to buy Figma fell apart in 2023 under pressure from regulators.

There are some reasons to believe that Figma could pull it off. Its financials are impressive, per the S-1 filing.

The company brought in $749 million in revenue in 2024, a 48% jump from 2023. Figma's revenue continued to rise in the first quarter of 2025 with 46% year-over-year growth. The company reported rolling 12-month revenue as $821 million, with a 91% gross margin.

Figma's profit is interesting, too. The company was profitable in 2023 and then swung to a giant loss of $732 million in 2023. But this was largely due to one-time expenses related to a major employee stock compensation event. (Figma issued 10.5 million stock options, with a strike price of $8.50 per share to eligible employees, it said.)

By the fourth quarter of 2024, Figma reported profits again, as it did in Q1 of 2025.

Figma has also calculated its total debt to be so negligible that it reports it has none. But again, this is a line item that needs to be filled in. The company, naturally, has a revolving debt line, and left room to update its total debt in association with that.

We also don't know yet if any of the executives or VCs will be selling shares. Major backers include Index, Greylock, Kleiner Perkins, and Sequoia.

We do know that in 2024, executives took part of a big tender offer that allowed employees to cash out of shares. For instance, Figma co-founder CEO and chairman Dylan Field cashed out of $20 million worth of shares as part of that sale.

The S-1 document made another interesting disclosure, about co-founder Evan Wallace, who left Figma in 2021, according to his website. Wallace is named in the documents as a co-founder. However, Figma says Wallace has given Field full voting rights and control over his shares. Wallace's family trust holds about one-third of the super-voting rights Class B shares (15 votes per share, Figma says). All told, the S-1 discloses that Field, pre-IPO, controls about 75% of the voting rights.

The financials certainly look like the kind of company that Wall Street and retail investors typically like to buy. The app block cloud, if you can call it that, is a new type of software that lets companies build apps. Unlike most other marketplaces, Figma has its own set of tools.

Figma also stands out

"While we make, sell, and include generative AI rapidly

our products will remain competitive as new AI technologies are developed, adopted, and integrated into software solutions," the company says in the regulatory document.

When Figma announced its initial hoped-for price range on Monday (\$25-\$28), it also revealed an unusual decision for its highly anticipated IPO.

It will allow existing shareholders to sell more shares than the company plans to sell, by a high ratio. The company plans to offer about 12.5 million shares. Yet existing shareholders will be allowed to cash out of nearly 24.7 million shares, it said.

In addition, should this IPO be as hot as everyone thinks it will be, existing shareholders will get the option to sell, collectively, up to 5.5 million more shares.

Figma founder CEO Dylan Field has disclosed that he plans to sell 2.35 million shares. At the midrange he'll be cashing out of over $62 million. (That might be a much higher number if the IPO prices above $28, too.)

Even with that sale, he will still own an enormous

Design software startup Figma announced Tuesday it has filed its confidential paperwork for an IPO. We won't know more until that paperwork becomes public, which, best-case scenario would be in about a month.

However, with the stock market in groundhog mode — seeing its shadow with every new gyration of the Trump administration’s trade policies and tariffs — pursuing an IPO right now is surprising, even at an exploratory level. Klarna and StubHub, the two potentially blockbuster tech IPOs that were humming along last month, both hit the pause button in early April after the stock market crashed on tariff news. They have not yet rescheduled.

While Figma is working on an IPO, that doesn’t mean it will proceed in the usual timeline, which is often four to six weeks after confidential paperwork has been accepted.

Figma, the web app maker, raised $12.5 billion in a tender offer cash out buy Figma in 2023 in Europe.

The company is led by Capital, Perkins, along with Andreessen Horowitz and IVP.

Figma declined further comment.
