Andreessen Horowitz is moving its corporate home from Delaware to Nevada

By Kia Kokalitcheva

Published July 10, 2025

Andreessen Horowitz, one of Silicon Valley's most influential venture firms, said on Wednesday that it's moving its state of incorporation from Delaware to Nevada in search of more business-friendly policies.

While a few publicly traded companies, including Meta, Dropbox, TripAdvisor, and Roblox, have planned or made the westward move in recent times, the trend hasn't really caught on in startup-land yet.

The firm, which urged other companies to consider leaving Delaware, attributed its Nevada preference to a number of factors: a codified Business Judgement Rule, personal liability protection for directors and officers, a higher threshold for shareholders inspecting the books, and a view that the courts are catching up to Delaware's.

A16z is no stranger to Nevada. Both of its founders have established personal ties to the state and have purchased homes in the Las Vegas area. Co-founder Ben Horowitz has worked with the city's police department to deploy new technologies. The firm also has close ties to entrepreneur Elon Musk, who reincorporated X (formerly Twitter) in the state in 2023. Musk moved Tesla's corporate home to Texas from Delaware last year following a Chancery Court decision that stripped him of a lofty compensation package.

It remains to be seen if smaller startups and investors follow suit. The move may make more sense for firms like Andreessen Horowitz, which has grown beyond the traditional shape of a boutique venture firm and now manages billions across various asset classes.
