The US Congress has passed the first-ever federal legislation to regulate the crypto industry, a key sign of lawmakers' changing sentiment as the sector seeks greater legitimacy and adoption.

Additionally, the US House also passed the Clarity Act, which sets rules for the broader cryptocurrency market and outlines the oversight roles of the SEC and the Commodity Futures Trading Commission. The bill will now go to the US Senate for consideration.

The significant progress of both bills rounds out a tense week, which saw members of President Trump's own party nearly tanking the plans over concerns regarding government surveillance of crypto.

After hours of negotiations, the bills both passed and set another historic mark: the longest vote in the US House ever.
