Design software maker Figma files to go public

By Rosie Bradbury

Published July 2, 2025

Figma filed its IPO prospectus on Tuesday, which revealed a 48% jump in yearly revenue growth in the year after Adobe's attempted \$20 billion merger.

Figma, which tapped Morgan Stanley and Goldman Sachs to run its IPO process on the New York Stock Exchange, is a fast-growing collaborative design and product creation software company widely used by enterprises.

Figma's S-1 filing shows that the company has strengthened its books. Over the past four years, its revenue growth has compounded at an annual rate of 53%. In Q1, Figma made a profit of $44.9 million with a non-GAAP operating margin of 18%. It also had 11,107 paid customers with at least $10,000 in annual recurring revenue and a net dollar retention rate of 132%.

Figma says it had 13 million monthly active users as of the end of March, and two-thirds of them are not designers. It also says that 95% of Fortune 500 companies use its products.

Like many other late-stage startups, Figma held back on going public until market conditions improved. But positive public investor reception of VC-backed companies like Circle and CoreWeave are slowly convincing more startups to go public, in long-awaited relief for investors.

Figma's public filing marks the next step in its road to the public markets, 18 months after its attempted sale to Adobe fell through following regulatory concerns. It did collect the $1 billion termination fee in 2023 from Adobe.

Major venture investors in Figma include Index Ventures, Greylock Partners, Kleiner Perkins and Sequoia.
