GitHub co-founder raising $100M fund to back early-stage tech startups

By Michael Bodley

Published May 30, 2025

Tom Preston-Werner, a co-founder of GitHub, is aiming to raise $100 million for a new VC fund that will back early-stage technology companies, according to a regulatory filing.

This is Preston-Werner's latest act, having co-founded language learning startup Chatterbug after parting ways from GitHub under contentious circumstances more than a decade ago.

Preston-Werner Ventures' \(PWV\) vehicle has not completed fundraising yet, according to the regulatory filing and a person familiar with the matter. Until now, Preston-Werner has been investing his own money into startups, and the firm had previously set up rolling funds through AngelList, according to a separate regulatory filing.

PWV is the latest tech insider to jump into raising a venture fund amid the broader downturn in the asset class. The number of early-stage tech deals has dipped despite deal values rising, according to PitchBook's 2024 Emerging Tech Indicator.

Preston-Werner has tapped tech startup veteran David Price and David Thyresson, a longtime entrepreneur who last worked with Price at RedwoodJS, as general partners of the fund.

The firm declined to comment on the fund.

The firm has invested in startups including the clean energy-focused Commonwealth Fusion Systems, which reportedly raised more than $1 billion earlier this month. PWV has also invested in AI startup Anysphere, which just raised $900 million at a $9 billion valuation, according to PitchBook data.
