— funded by another acquisition — representing a critical part of that strategy. It aims to grow its presence in key markets like China, where it claims to be the top gaming accessories brand, and North America, which already accounts for 50 percent of sales.

That's yet to come and Razer can point to being profitable in 2014 — to the tune of $20.3 million —

Data via Razer

Revenue-wise, Razer is in a tricky spot. Total sales growth hasn't been amazing, instead the company's real opportunity is that the global games

Industry itself will expand to give it more customers to sell to.

There's precious little analysis on the peripherals space but a report commissioned by Razer itself concluded that gaming peripherals were a $2 billion market in 2016. With the base of global gamers predicted to jump from two billion in 2016 to 2.7 billion in 2021, Razer is pitching investors on that opportunity coupled with its forays into mobile, AV, services
